Foreign Languages

Did you ever notice that the first prompt at the ATM asks what language you want to conduct your transaction in? While this question is an option for some individuals, for others it is not an option—it is their only choice.

According to the United States Census Bureau, the number of Americans that list English as their second language is rising. In order to meet the numerous needs of this growing group, individuals with bilingual skills are in demand in various sectors of the job market.

Foreign Language Majors at King's College

At King's, students who major in a foreign language won't just meet job market demands—they'll exceed them. As you take courses in French or Spanish (or even both if you wish) you will not only gain the ability to speak, read and write in another language, but you will also gain a through understanding of the culture from which the language originated. In doing this, you will enter the workforce better prepared to understand and meet the needs of individuals from various backgrounds.

Beginning the program

Whether you're a seasoned speaker or just beginning to learn a language, King's faculty members will select a starting level in the program that will challenge you, yet not overwhelm you.

Study Abroad

While the classroom is a great place to acquire language skills, one of the best ways to learn a language is to experience it. King's offers students numerous opportunities to study, student teach or intern at various locations throughout the world.
