Human Resource Management

You're hired! Weren't those the best words you've ever heard? Getting a job meant you would be earning your own money and could spend it however you pleased. But I bet you can't guess who else was happy you got the job? (If you guessed your mom and dad, you're right, but that's not what we're looking for here.) The answer is the human resources manager.

Now you might be wondering who the human resources manager is and why he or she would be happy you got the job. Well, there's a good reason for that—it's the HR manager's responsibility to hire qualified individuals (like yourself) for jobs. But did you know HR managers provide many other important benefits to businesses and their employees? Read on for the details!

Human Resources Management (HRM) at King's

Ranked by MONEY magazine and Salary.com as the fourth best job in America, a human resources manager's main job function is to manage the most important aspect of any company—the employees. In order for human resources managers to help employees perform to their full potential and consequently help the company achieve its goals, they must have a thorough understanding of human behavior along with standard business practices. King's curriculum will prepare you to work in all areas of human resources. You will learn how to build communication within an organization, become a skilled labor negotiator, motivate employees, resolve conflicts and create safe and healthy workplaces. You can also tailor your studies to a specific area of HR that interests you including compensation and benefits, recruiting and staffing, or training and development.

In order to truly experience this rapidly growing field, many students elect to complete an internship. By working side-by-side with a HRM professional, you will be ready for the workforce
