Pre-Health Professions

Is your goal to become a doctor? Are you interested in the field of health but not sure in what part of the medical field your talents lie? Maybe you aren't interested in practicing medicine, but caring for patients? As long as there are germs and diseases, there is going to be a need for medical professionals. So if you are interested in a career in any type of healthcare, a pre-health major is the path for you.

Pre-health at King's

At King's, we have developed an academic and career preparation program specifically for pre-health students. Our faculty will advise you as to which courses to take and help you to select a major. Most pre-health students major in biology, however there are numerous science-based majors you can choose from including general science, chemistry, neuroscience and psychology.

While some universities may reserve research opportunities for students in their junior and senior years, King's pre-health majors have the opportunity to conduct research as early as their freshman year. By working side-by-side with faculty, students gain solid observation and research skills that will set you apart from your peers when you dive into the very competitive pool of professional school applicants.

Real world preparation

One of the best ways a student can prepare for a career in health care is to experience it first-hand. Through our job shadowing and internship programs, our students discover their strengths and can confidently choose which area of medicine is for them. The high quality of academic preparation, the emphasis placed on research and the patient care exposure at King's serve as prerequisites for successful entrance into professional school graduate studies

Early Entrance to Professional Programs

Through special agreements, qualified students have the option of entering health profession post-graduate programs after their junior year, which cuts off a year of their bachelors' degree program (and the tuition associated with it).

Where are they now?
